The continuity of the tule mats, the bulrush- the tules are still here, the animals, most of them are still here. There are some that have been decimated- the sage grouse, some species of salmon. The time that they [Lewis and Clark] came through, the reasonable estimates are probably between 16 and 20 million fish came up that river home to our tributaries and drainage systems. And now a million to 5 million, people think is a lot. Abundance was a different measurement then. Our well-being was measured differently then.
